It is ms Tan's contention that the value system inside a person is determined by a number of factors such as his/her background, past experience, faith, beliefs, awareness, and the environment. The value system can reveal both the pleasant and unpleasant sides of human behaviours. In our assessments of value, we are often understandably concerned not only with whether something is good or bad but also with how good or bad it is. Such ideas drive the existence of major tensions in my work, exploring the human struggles between the nature, unfair rampant urbanization, and the ownership of natural resources.
